Dow Hits 40,000 Milestone As Inflation Fears Ebb

Equity and bond markets are telling us that inflation is not a major concern as interest rates fall sharply and the Dow Jones Industrial Average (DJIA) closes above the 40,000 milestone, putting the Dow in new record territory, alongside the S&P 500 and Nasdaq 100.

Last week, producer prices came in higher than expected – but revisions were sharply down – and consumer prices came in soft enough that all this inflation data was good enough to pick equities up and push rates down. Inflation fears are definitely ebbing, if not disappearing. Also fueling the equity market’s rally is the continued parade of corporate earnings coming in significantly higher than expectations. With profit margins stable to improving and interest rates falling, we see the valuations of the price-earnings multiple expanding.

There has been much concern over the health of the consumer, but last week’s earnings report from Walmart (WMT) showed the consumer is alive and still spending, sending the stock soaring up 7% and reaching a record high.

All these new record highs are supported by market breadth (as measured by the Bloomberg NYSE cumulative advance-decline line) also hitting record highs. The Bull is charging, and we expect the Bull to run through the summer months.

The leadership remains Technology and Tech-related, with the leadership broad index NYSE FANG+ also hitting a record all-time high. But the most important observation is that this index had a massive multi-year breakout of an inverted head and shoulders pattern, pointing to a sustainable rally and ongoing new highs. Semiconductors also continue to be leaders but have not yet reached new highs.

World Markets Also Charging Ahead With New Record Highs

The Japanese Nikkei 225 index reached an all-time high in March, and in Europe, the indexes for the equity markets in the UK, Germany and France all recently hit record highs. The iShares MSCI All Country World Index (ACWI) ETF reached a record all-time high. No question about it: the world is in a "Charging Bull" market.

Emerging Markets Show A Heartbeat

Even the Emerging Markets, which have lagged significantly and way off their highs, are beginning to show a heartbeat by breaking out. China now appears to have bottomed.

Interest Rates Fall Sharply

Interest rates have plummeted as fears of inflation have ebbed. The upward trendline for rates is now clearly broken. In our view, rates for the cycle have peaked. Look for the Federal Reserve to try to begin lowering rates before the U.S. presidential election.

Initial Public Offerings Show Improvement

New IPOs are trending higher – yet another bullish sign for equity markets. In the accompany chart, we look at Renaissance IPO ETF (IPO), which tracks an index of companies that have recently completed an initial public offering and are listed on a U.S. exchange.

What's Next: Equity Market Bull Trend Is Strong... 6000-7000 For S&P 500?

The S&P 500 has had a significant technical breakout: the trend channel, in effect since the lows of 2009, with the top of the channel set in 2021-2022, is now being challenged. A clear break above this channel points to a longer-term target for the S&P 500 at 6000 or an additional 13% move above last Thursday's close (5/16/24). Importantly, using point and figure charts, which measure the supply and demand of pricing, we see that 7000 is achievable longer-term or a 30% plus move. [Note: back in the February 26th edition of The Week Ahead, we first indicated that "Our longer-term projected target has moved to a range of 6100-7000 from just 5144."]

What all this is telling us is simple: Staying invested over the coming years should prove to generate strong returns in equity portfolios. As we have been saying, this is a secular bull market, and we don't see this Bull peaking until later in the decade. We remain Bulls and continue to recommend buying equities.

All Eyes On The Dow & NVIDIA Earnings As All Ears Get Filled With Fed Speak

This week NVIDIA earnings can determine whether the Dow at 40,000 will hold!

Including commencement speeches from this past weekend (Fed Chair Powell at Georgetown Law and Fed Board Governor Kugler at UVA), there's a total of eight planned speeches this week, creating a cacophony of Fed Speak – which can move markets early in the week. So, we will be listening – because everything said could reveal the Fed's sentiment about future rate actions. And we will also be reading – because on Wednesday, the minutes from the FOMC meeting of 4/30-5/1 will be released. More fodder for the markets' fixation on the future direction of interest rates and the future movement in AI related companies.

Also on Wednesday, after the market closes, all eyes will be on the earnings announcement from NVIDIA (NVDA). It will also be important to hear what the company says about its business outlook going forward. This could directly impact whether the Dow will hold above the 40,000 mark.

On the economic front, the key data this week will be home sales and durable goods. But frankly, the excitement will be watching the DJIA's staying power at its new milestone.
