Trump Moves Fast, Markets Hold Steady—For Now

There's been a lot thrown at the markets over the past three weeks since Donald Trump returned to the White House.

The equity and bond markets have had to digest lots of news: from threatened tariffs and headline-grabbing executive orders to the regular parade of corporate earnings and highly anticipated economic releases. Yet, the markets appear to be holding strong (so far) in a seasonally weak month. They've sometimes whipsawed back and forth as investors have watched how formerly "normal" ways of doing things have been upended. One publication we follow described Trump's rapid series of executive actions as "shock and awe." Another accurate term for his political artistry seems to be "flood the zone," a phrase coined by Trump ally Steve Bannon in 2017.

Steve Bannon's 'Flood the Zone' Strategy Explained Amid Trump Policy Blitz

The technique isn't new. Last week, we compared Trump to Teddy Roosevelt for carrying a big stick. This week the comparison is Franklin Roosevelt. While FDR and DJT share little on the surface, both spoke plainly to the public—a trait they may owe to their New York roots (just like Teddy). Another parallel: a blizzard of executive orders overwhelming opposition. FDR signed over 300 a year, many in his first 100 days. Trump, who has praised FDR before, seems just as eager to move fast. The result is market volatility—which, to their credit, the markets have been able to digest and manage. But again, we say "so far."

Threat Of Tariffs Fades From The Front Page... For Now?

In what appears to be the shortest trade war on record, last Monday – just hours before a 25% tariff on goods from her country were due to take effect – Mexican President Claudia Sheinbaum announced a deal to delay them. She agreed to post 10,000 Mexican troops to her northern border to cut down on illegal crossings and the illegal export of fentanyl, one of Trump's main demands. Shortly after, Canadian Prime Minister Justin Trudeau announced that Canada would also cooperate in cutting down the transport of fentanyl and, while he did not place troops on the border (the Canada-U.S. border is 3x the length of the Mexico-U.S. border), he did pledge assistance from Canadian authorities in clamping down on illegal crossings. The fright that struck the markets the week prior suddenly faded into relief.

Then, last Friday, President Trump announced that he will impose reciprocal tariffs to ensure U.S. exports are “treated evenly” by America’s trading partners. The markets again reacted negatively. While we don’t believe Trump is looking to start a trade war, this appears to be his strategy to push other countries into negotiations over their own trade barriers. Ultimately, we expect this approach to be successful, but in the meantime, the uncertainty it creates is weighing on both stock and bond markets. In our view, choppy is the best way to describe market conditions for the foreseeable future.

Treasuries Look Healthy

Newly minted Treasury Secretary Scott Bessent made no changes in the Treasury’s quarterly refunding announcement last Wednesday morning. He announced that President Trump and the Treasury were focused not on short-term rates, but on the 10-year Treasury yield. We think this is a good choice: stock prices and the long-term investment decisions of companies are more closely related to 10-year Treasury yields (and the longer-term rates in general) than to short-term rates. We expect Bessent to work to lower longer Treasury yields so that he can lock in lower yields as the administration tries to tame the deficit. The 10-year Treasury note responded well to this news.

Revised Employment Data Implies The Fed Will Remain On Hold

Employment data for 2024 was revised downward by about 600,000 jobs last Friday in the Bureau of Labor Statistics' normal annual revisions. January job gains were 143,000, and while still strong, they came in shy of expectations, with unemployment at 4.0%, also a little less than expected. This led investors to conclude that the Federal Reserve (Fed) will maintain its current policy of wait-and-watch for the foreseeable future. Treasury rates rose a bit, but not substantially. We still expect 10-year Treasury yields to decline to around 4.2%.

Majority of Earnings Beating Expectations So Far

To date, 310 companies, 62% of the S&P 500, have reported fourth quarter earnings. Of those, nearly 77% beat earnings expectations, equal to the 5-year average of 77% and better than the 10-year average of 75%, according to FactSet. Year-over-year growth so far has been 16.4%. All in all, a good report so far, and while not every company has excelled, a healthy majority of them have.

Technology stocks have divided into two camps, one that is rising on a focus on software and consumer demand, another that is languishing a bit as investors digest the price gains achieved over the past year. We are concerned about "indigestion" in semiconductor stocks and reiterate our shift to Software. Palantir (PLTR) is a standout software company.

NYSE FANG+ Index In A Consolidation

The NYSE FANG+ index represents leading technology companies. With Tech and Tech-related stocks performing so well last year, they are taking a break to digest their strong gains by trading sideways as a group. We do not believe they are giving up their leadership role. We expect this consolidation can continue for weeks to a few months.

S&P Technology Sector Has A Buy Signal

The S&P 500 Information Technology sector has corrected nearly 10%. The sector is holding its 200-day moving average and has a buy signal from the 14-day Stochastic. We maintain that Technology is the leader of the secular bull market. We remain buyers on pullbacks.

Healthcare Stocks Show Some Resilience But Still Seem Wozy

Healthcare stocks have rallied a bit. We think this is mostly a tactical improvement, one playable by nimble investors looking for value. We note that the relative price of the sector is still in a long-term decline, showing the sector is out of favor.

S&P 500 And Nasdaq 100 Remain In Bull Trends

Despite market choppiness since the middle of December, we believe the S&P 500 and the Nasdaq 100 (represented by the QQQ ETF) remain in bull trends. The Moving Average Convergence/Divergence (MACD) indicator for both indexes has bottomed, showing improving price momentum. We do expect equity markets to remain volatile. The Bucking Bull is likely to remain with us. Our target for the S&P 500 remains 7200-7400 for this year.

Powell, Price Indexes And Politics To Make Headlines

This week, inflation, the Fed, and Trump will keep investors on their toes.

This week is relatively quiet on the economic data front, but that doesn't mean markets will be lacking catalysts, not least of which could be a continuation of President Trump's rapid and loud decision-making.

On the economic data side, inflation remains a priority as we get CPI on Wednesday and PPI on Thursday, followed by Industrial Production on Friday. Bond markets will remain hyper-focused on inflation data, searching for signals about the Fed's next move. Meanwhile, corporate earnings announcements are winding down in what appears to be a very positive season.

Fed Chair Powell heads to Capitol Hill this week for his semiannual testimony before Congress—appearing before the Senate Banking Committee on Tuesday and the House Financial Services Committee on Wednesday. It's his first testimony since July, and markets will be listening closely for any hints on the future path of interest rates.

While February is historically a seasonally weaker month for stocks, the tone set by Powell's remarks and inflation data could shape market sentiment heading into the spring.
